Speaking at the opening ceremony in the Russian Black Sea resort, the Russian president said the games would be remembered for generations. "Today is a truly great day for all of Russia, and this is the first time for all of us that we are holding the Olympic Games in the Black Sea region, on our own territory. "The kids that are coming to the games will be able to say that this is their Olympics." A statement on the Russian president's website said it was his first public appearance since August, when he sustained serious injuries when a drone carrying a bomb clipped a helicopter as he travelled back from a ski holiday. "We are ready for anything that could happen. There are no traces of protests at the moment." Police said a total of 303 protest permits had been issued to date - some from people sitting in a cardboard box next to the protesters. Gunnar

Thoresen, head of the IOC's security commission, said that despite the ban on protests, organisers were not expecting any issues. "The protesters have been told not to gather in the Olympic village. So they will be doing their thing in the woods, but we don't expect a lot of problems because they are not allowed to camp out in the Olympic village." The press release on Putin's website
